

If you've created something. You can stand there and feel accomplished. People will tell you what beautiful craftsmanship and professional touch you've got. You'll get praised and awarded for your artistic skills and that is wonderful. Practice makes a close to heart expression. Or mind.

But.. Wouldn't it be fantastic if you could take this opportunity to attach a message to your art? Something that can make a positive impact on the world and humanity. Now you could stand there and feel accomplished but also made a contribution to the world more than just a dash of color or a bang on the drum.

I am not saying that there is anything wrong with that. But why are you making art? Isn't it to express something you've got inside to create understanding and to find an outlet of the pressure rising inside you? Creativity I believe is simply an appreciative act to give and create beautiful things just in gratitude for being alive.

Like a peace offering, a peace gift to show the creator how much we love everything and everyone.

But that isn't the case right now Is it?

We're not there.

This is my philosophy around art. Do what you need to do. Express yourself and create without anyone in mind. But keep everyone in heart.

My message is my priority. My fame and recognition secondly.
But I am the vessel for the message. It's hard to find a way around that.

'Cause you know what. It will be completely inhumane.
